

Real Play Money Of The Future®

A sketch comedy idea

by Jonathan D. Steinhoff, copyright 3.23.12

In the year 2063, we find office environments have changed in a strange way, at least this environment has. We find that a company uses an obnoxious system of allotting to their workers, based on status and tasks, an in-company currency coupled to a system based on bartering. Everyone appears very accustomed to this as a fact of life, using this system as if it is the most natural thing.

For example, Person A uses the in-house currency to purchase the stapler of his co-worker, Person B. And also Person B's mouse pad. And the wheels on Person B's office chair. Eventually, Person B reduces himself to almost nothing after selling so much. However, with all that in-house currency from selling these items to Person A (who became very wealthy in in-house currency ever since he sold electronic copies of a 1927 report, "Rainfall In The Rainforest", which was very popular, necessary to what his workgroup was doing, in fact), Person B can now purchase a software that helps him work on data documents, which will greatly improve a report he's writing. There are those who become the equivalent of homeless (one can sell or rent one's cubicle), the office essentially being a microcosm of a cutthroat capitalist environment. It's like real currency – especially when your job depends on it!